GHANA CHRIST

For God, Family and Country

P. O. Box DD 66, Dodowa | 0307079799 | www.gcihs.edu.gh

FROM:	ADMINISTRATOR
TO:	0332
DATE:	27-05-2025
REFERENCE:	MEMO-NONE-NONE-NONE-20250527-001
SUBJECT:	HI

The Clockmaker’s Promise

In a quiet village nestled between two misty hills, there lived an old clockmaker named Eliot. His workshop, filled with ticking and tocking, was the heartbeat of the town. People came from far and wide to marvel at his intricate creations—grandfather clocks, pocket watches, and tiny music boxes that danced to silent tunes only the soul could hear.

One winter evening, a little girl named Mira appeared at his door, clutching a broken wooden bird in her mittened hands. “It used to sing,” she whispered, eyes wide. “My papa made it before he went away.”

Eliot studied the toy, its gears rusted, spring snapped. He looked at the girl’s hopeful face and said softly, “Come back tomorrow.”

That night, Eliot worked in silence, using a gear no bigger than a grain of rice and winding the spring as delicately as one winds a dream. Just before dawn, the bird sang—a single, sweet note that shimmered in the cold morning air.

When Mira returned, she gasped as the bird chirped in her hands. “It’s magic!”

“No,” Eliot smiled, brushing sawdust from his apron. “It’s memory, wound back to life.”

Years later, long after Eliot had passed and the shop stood still, the bird still sang every morning—reminding the village of the clockmaker who kept time, not with gears, but with love.

Would you like it adapted into a poem or illustrated story?

